The discovery of liquid crystals lead to many applications in science and technology, the most common being LCD (Liquid Crystal Display) screens. To discover more about liquid crystals I went to Kent State University to do research on the properties of defects in a nematic liquid crystal known as 4-pentyl-4-cyanobiphenyl. There I learned how to create and align a liquid crystal cell and construct defect loops within the cell in which to study.